Twitter Thread by Randy

Randy
@egg_report

Anyone who looks into the camera like this is insane, 99% a maladjusted narcissist. Autoplaying videos on a website is terrorism

> \U0001f1eb\U0001f1eeFinland ranks best in Europe for fighting disinformation
>
> And the country puts its success down to its children's robust education@Harrietmbarber explains pic.twitter.com/IzBFJxvYzX
>
> — Telegraph Global Health Security (@TelGlobalHealth) February 19, 2021

If you pay attention you can tell that she's looking at herself on the screen & not actually you, the audience, as it's supposed to look like on your end. You can deduce this but thinking about it for all of one second, or, you can notice how she has to keep herself from smiling

Anyone who can look or act "normal" while looking at their own reflection in real time, is fucking nuts. Someone who gets off on it, while also being conscious that this should be hidden, but then does it anyway? Extremely nuts & also willingly deceiving on a personal level

Knowingly being filmed/mirrorrd/recorded is physically instinctively unpleasant and it fucks with your self-relation. What the camera does is make it impossible to be yourself, because immediate distinction between self and world is shattered.

The moment the camera is turned on, you are no longer "acting" in the philosophical sense, directly engaging with whatever is it, the world - you are "acting" in the theater sense. It is instrumental and necessary, there is no way out of it. Being observed changes being,

Changes behavior. And observing self, observing being observed, that's on a primal level dissociative. The human, genuine, honest reaction to this is madness: the Mike ma scream, Sam hydes whole thing, all of "funny internet videos".

What's so disastrous about this trend of short annoying nagging bitch infomercials that's being promoted across the board is that it's literally evil. Before she's said a word, she's already lying to you. The genre is lying to you. The medium is the message