Twitter Thread by bill

bill
@BTH_Bill

Sometimes I learn a piece of new information that makes me say, "That's enough. I am done learning for today. I don't want to read or think anymore."

Oklahoma governor Frank Keating's brother Mark wrote a novel about a man named Tom McVey blowing up a building in Oklahoma City, who was later apprehended because he committed a minor traffic violation... years before that very scenario played out with Tim McVeigh

One of the first victims of the anthrax attacks in 2001 was tabloid photographer Robert Stevens. One of his editors was Michael Irish. Irish's wife, Gloria, rented apartments over the summer of 2001 to suspected hijackers Marwan Al-Shehhi and Hamza Alghamdi.

The photographer who shot the iconic/haunting "Falling Man" photograph on 9/11 (supposedly with a digital camera that couldn't have possibly done the job) was also present when Bobby Kennedy was assassinated in 1968.

https://t.co/1s8F0yKBK9

> \u201cDrew certainly isn\u2019t a newcomer to the tougher moments of this country\u2019s history. At the very beginning of his career he was one of only four photographers in the kitchen of the Los Angeles hotel when Bobby Kennedy was shot and killed.\u201d\U0001f914\U0001f9d0 https://t.co/JQ6M9qgq0N
>
> — Alfredo Gomes (@mindgomes) May 4, 2021

Anyway these were three recent ones that just sorta made me wish I never learned how to read

I'll just keep going.

In 1997, FBI special agent Dwayne Fusilier's son helped make a Columbine school video that eerily mimicked the shooting that was to take place two years later. Despite this, Agent Fusilier did not recuse himself from investigating the case.