#11 The Pop Culture email

Purpose: To leverage existing pop culture and tie it to your product. This can be anything from popular Netflix shows to trending topics.

If you want a good example of this, check out what @TheChivery is doing

#12 What's in the pipeline:

Purpose: Use this email to inform customers about new products you're working on.

Focus on building a relationship by keeping them up to date on what your brand is working on

#13 The villain email

Purpose: To deepen your relationship with your audience by talking about common villains

Eg if you are a vegan brand, then red meat might be your "common villain"

#14 The listicle email

Purpose: To educate and entertain your audience

Remember what I said before about not burning your list with sale after sale.

Listicles like "10 ways to x" are a great way to increase your engagement and improve open rates

#15 Piggyback

Purpose: If you're really struggling for ideas, this one works every time.

What you do is find a powerful quote/lesson from a guru/expert/influencer in your niche and use it to relate back to your product.

#16 The Friday newsletter

Purpose: To send a regular newsletter to your list.

This one is more for personal brands but it's an effective way to give value to your customers.

Eg David Perell does it with Friday Finds.

#17 The Useful Tips

Purpose: Deliver straight value to your list by giving them practical and useful tips

Eg Does your brand sell fashion products for women? You could write a blog about how to dress for the next season

#18 Breaking myths email

Purpose : To break a common myth in your niche and build authority.

This is particularly useful for health related brands.

Every niche has common myths you can break.

Eg for health, a myth might be eating more eggs are bad for you

#19 the FAQ email

Purpose: To answer all the FAQs customers send you

Make a list of all the FAQs and turn them into an email. So easy!

#20 The direct quote email

Purpose: Similar to the testimonial except your best quote from existing customers and use it as a subject line

This one always works wonders if the quote is good
