

Twitter Thread by Leela

Leela

@leelaraagam

Since the recent RTI "incident" with regards to lack of sources in the assertions of NCERT books, I decided to do some research.

Some initial findings:

In the VIII class text-book, chapter 8 titled "Women, Caste and Reform" the chapter starts with a section on Sati. ■

(1/9)

I have said this before: Sati was not widely practiced in India. Don't take my word for it, read up Meenakshi Jain's seminal work on this topic: "Sati: Evangelicals, Baptist Missionaries, and the Changing Colonial Discourse."

Or do this, ask people around you about their experiences with caste & you will observe that you will get multiple examples (while assertions of caste-based discrimination may be debated, almost everyone will acknowledge caste-consciousness). However, ask folks if they have heard stories of Sati within their own family history or in the histories of friends, acquaintances, & you will draw a blank.

(2/9)

(3/9)

NOTE1: Sati did exist, & women were (are) discriminated against. But wasn't the main challenge women faced. Or even the 10th on the list!

NOTE2: Hindu scriptures don't really celebrate

(4/9)

Sati; in the Mahabharat, there's a reference to Sati - Madri immolates herself after Pandu's death in the forest - but neither is Madri an important character in the narrative neither is her sacrifice referred to in popular discourse on the two epics.

The point is, this

(5/9)

could have been a footnote but colonized that we are, NCERT gives it the same (undue) emphasis that the British did.

Later in the chapter, there's a reference to Muslim Begums in Bengal opening schools for girls, while in contrast, Pandita

Ramabai's (a Sanskrit scholar)

(6/9)

assertion about Hinduism's oppressiveness toward women. Sigh.

Also, the language on page 99 is telling: it says both "Hindu nationalists" and "orthodox Muslims" were worried about women adoption western ways.

Look at the equivalence.

Rest of the chapter is about

(7/9)

the caste system, though only in the Hindu context. Casteism in other religions is completely ignored. The chapter ends with three blurbs.

One on Sir Syed Ahmad Khan - founder of Aligarh Muslim University.

One on the Singh Sabha Movement.

And finally, curiously,

(8/9)

about Slavery in the US!

Now you know why young Indian minds always conflate the two (racism & casteism); that's what they've been taught.

This was exhausting & frustrating.

Sigh. (9/9)

Source: <https://t.co/g5ksTCOYI>

#Observations