Now is not the time to travel. If you have plans to head somewhere for the long weekend, cancel them. There are other, safer ways for you to connect with your family and friends. For those who need to travel, take note of the measures that are in place when you return to Canada:

If you're flying back into the country, you'll need to show a negative PCR test result before you board the plane. When you land, you'll need to take another PCR test. You'll then have to wait at an approved hotel, and at your own expense, for your results to come back.

If your results come back negative for COVID-19, you'll be able to head home and finish your mandatory quarantine there. If your test results come back positive, you'll need to immediately quarantine in designated government facilities. This is not optional.

If you're returning through our land border, you'll need to show a negative PCR test result that was taken within the past 72 hours. On top of that, you'll have to take a PCR test when you arrive - and you'll have to take another one toward the end of your 14-day quarantine.

These border measures are some of the strongest in the world - and they're in place to keep you, your loved ones, and your community safe. For more information on what you can expect when you return to Canada and how you can get prepared, click here: https://t.co/7sYIgkMm3U
