Twitter Thread by Naima Cochrane

When Presidents propose a bill or plan, congress still has to draft and pass the bill in full, bc it includes more than just "issue this check."

So ask your congressional rep where your checks are, because it's on congress to get it through.

Nah. Where\u2019s the $2000?

Biden did sign an executive order last week to push the treasury to expedite delivery of the initial $600 payment that was already approved in December, because a lot of eligible folks still haven't received it, even though the deadline for disbursement was Jan 15th.

Y'all wanna hold Biden to his promises this term, hold your folks in house and senate to theirs, because it's their job to negotiate plans and bills and pass them. Not everything can be done through executive order. Biden's ability to do what he says is reliant on them.

The proposed American Rescue Plan hasn't even been approved by congress yet - they couldn't start work on drafting the bill before he was sworn in, but they are the next step to your money.

Yes, that exact congress (senate may be 50/50 but Dems are in control and Harris has the tie-breaking vote), because they couldn't start work on this until Biden officially took office. https://t.co/6WK71PtjNI

The same Congress y'all said needed to be turned blue before things could get done? Oh okay. https://t.co/ShJ9qEwKKz

— \U0001f451 (@jasminaza_) January 26, 2021

You can issue an EO for an ACTION, but the stimulus plan is ... a PLAN. There are multiple parts to it in addition to the payment that all go together. It has to actually be WRITTEN. We've all read about how the house had to add this, change that for the previous plans. https://t.co/AuW3TIHrrR

Naima, don't do this. Trump showed us the power of executive orders and the bully pulpit. There's nothing wrong with Dems learning from him.

— Mello (@MelAnthony15) January 26, 2021

The President does not write plans and bills. Congress does. https://t.co/AuW3TIHrrR

Naima, don't do this. Trump showed us the power of executive orders and the bully pulpit. There's nothing wrong with Dems learning from him.

— Mello (@MelAnthony15) January 26, 2021

Also more than half the EO's Trump signed were bullshit, bc the man didn't have the patience, tolerance or comprehension to actually read through anything. He just wanted to sign shit.

They were the equivalent of giving a cat a ball of string.

Let me fix what I was about to tweet: the new congressional term may have started Jan 6th, but the new administration started last Wednesday at 12:01pm. Congress wouldn't work on legislature for the 46th administration while still in the 45th administration. So no, they couldn't https://t.co/5ZheiFqTw8

They could have started working on it beforehand in the house when the new term started.

The Senate wasn\u2019t going to until the inauguration because of the Turtle.

- Mario Latilleon (@latilleon) January 26, 2021

Biden could not just walk in on Wed afternoon and say "Here y'all. We wrote the plan. Just pas it." That's not how congress works, y'all.

This is also a valid point https://t.co/4dDMytmVG8

FYI: We didn\u2019t have a Treasury Secretary until last night. You kinda want one of those in place before you start trying to craft fiscal policy.

- Corey Richardson (@vexedinthecity) January 26, 2021

A simple explanation re: executive orders vs the need for congress to draft legislation. Like I mentioned Biden issued an EO for outstanding payments from the Dec bill that was passed. https://t.co/JDxsbP2ZFh

To put it another way for @MelAnthony15, EO\u2019s are strictly the President using his or her powers to execute laws already on the books. The President has breathing room to execute the law as they interpret it, and if the President overreaches, they can be sued...

— Mario Latilleon (@latilleon) January 26, 2021

https://t.co/WrLJZGQy8S

Or Congress can write a new bill (that has to be signed by the President or passed with a supermajority to override a Presidential veto) to override an executive order.

- Mario Latilleon (@latilleon) January 26, 2021

CIVICS CLASSES FOR EVERYBODY!!

So just real quick because the separation of powers was blurred like shit during the Trump administration and I think this will be crucial to keep in mind during the first 100 days:

The President has an agenda/priorities, but only congress drafts actual law.

The President does not control Congress or dictate his policies to it. Our Constitution specifically divided powers between the three branches of government so that no single branch could dominate the others.

Even when the President and both houses of Congress are of the same political party, Congress often disagrees with the President's priorities, or at least the specifics of some of his policy recommendations. You are seeing it now in the fight over the highway bill where the President is threatening a veto because he thinks Congress is spending way too much money.

The powers are separated yet shared; the President can propose legislation; Congress can change it to its liking; and the President can veto it; and two thirds of both Houses can override that veto and thereby enact the law without the president's consent.

And we actually shouldn't want a POTUS to lean on congress the way Trump did; it defeats the strength of "checks and balances" ppl like to talk about.

Then, there's the stark difference between how House and Senate operate.

Second, the struggles between the House and Senate. The two houses are different in their culture, their makeup, their outlook, and their procedures. The House, has 435 members representing congressional districts of roughly 650,000 people, whereas each of the 50 states has two senators, regardless of population, who represent state interests.

House members run every two years; senators every six years. So the house tends to be more local, more parochial, more attuned to public opinion and sentiments than the Senate. It reacts more quickly to popular anger and discontent, for instance.

The snapshot: house moves more quickly than senate (as we've seen), and the house is designed for it's members to be closest representation of the ppl (like an AOC), which is why their terms are every 2 years vs Senate's 6 years.

The senate, though, is full of power plays be they can jam things up indefinitely (as we've also seen). It's the epitome of all the worst things we think of when we think "playing politics"

But ultimately, the President needs congress to be on their side in order to actually fulfill an agenda that goes beyond undoing existing legislature (which is most of what Trump did in the beginning of his term), which is what jammed 44 up so badly.

If you read this whole thread and your takeaway is that I'm carrying water for Biden, then I got nothing. Not liking Biden is your prerogative & I get it; conflating legislative process with lies and false promises is something different. https://t.co/qlu7UR8t96

Honest question: why do you feel the need to do all this? do you not feel also lied to by your president? why are you so on here carrying his water for free

— no more police no more prison no more military (@mwillz_) January 26, 2021

Because some ppl seem to think my remarks about congress needing to draft and pass the next stimulus plan extend to Biden waiting for Congress to do anything (bc why read what I actually said?) here are the EO's 46 has signed, day by day, so far:

https://t.co/T3HoP3oRWa

Lemme add this to make sure folks see it, plus emphasize again that we just got a Secretary of the Treasury LAST NIGHT. https://t.co/l1yHbuiWIU

Also important to note that Congress has the power of the purse. Biden cannot draft an executive order that has dollars attached to it. That has to be done through legislation.

— Trenise (@Trenise) January 26, 2021

Aight y'all. I gotta get off twitter for a few hours bc I feel asleep on my couch at like 10pm and I'm behind on two deadlines (that I was supposed to be working on the last 2 hours instead of talking about congress).

B