The Christmas Day Truce.

On Christmas Eve 1914 soldiers hunkered down in trenches no further than 150 meters away from the enemy in a network of channels and human trough lines stretching across the north of France all the way to Switzerland.

Separating the warring sides was No Man's Land, and it doesn't matter what side initiated the ceasefire, what matters is it happened. The fighting stopped. The 1914 Christmas truce was not the first unofficial truce of this great conflict, but certainly one of the last.

The sound of the other side's conversations, laughter, groaning and singing replaced the falling of shells and the rain of steel.

Most accounts say it was the Germans that started the Christmas celebration as their clocks would have indicated it was Christmas back home one hour earlier than the British and French again, it really doesn't matter. What does matter, at least for this writing, is soldiers looking across No Man's Land and not seeing carnage, but rather seeing tiny Christmas trees with candles pop up on the German side or Allied soldiers holding up cigarettes and waving their caps. The sound of music and laughter filled the lifeless void their world had become. Initially, both sides planned to deploy their burial and body retrieval squads before the next day's fighting took place as that would have been the "humane" thing to do in war. On Christmas Eve, the overnight temperatures had frozen the mud and a thin layer of snow began to fall. Snowfall seems to deaden sound across distance, but the reported cacophony of Christmas carols floated on the snowflakes that day as soldiers popped their heads up and in an act of wartime defiance and bravery, both sides emerged from their respective trenches. Enemies only hours before walked towards one another, exchanging looks of fear and hopefulness.

There are accounts of a German voice cutting the silence in northern France with the line: "You no shoot, we no shoot." It is at this point where faith in their fellow man was perhaps made possible through football in addition to the exchanging of gifts, handshakes, cigarettes, and pictures of sweethearts back home. The most extraordinary incident. The Germans started shouting to come out' and 'have a drink' and also climbing about in trenches. The ball appeared from somewhere, It was a proper football. They took their coats off some of them and put them down as goalposts. One fellow went in goal and then it was just a general kickabout. One of them came out in front without rifle, as one of ours went out, too. A huge crowd formed. We had found a little rubber ball so, of course, a football match came

No referee, we didn't need a referee for that kind of game. It was like playing as a kid in the streets, kicking the ball about and the referee being the policeman and chasing you off. There was no score, no tally at all. It was simply a melee. Nothing like the football you see on tv. The boots we wore were a menace those great big boots we had on and in those days the balls were made of leather and they soon got very soggy. A great many of the passes went wide, but all the amateur footballers, although they have been very tired, played with huge enthusiasm ... but after an hour's play, commanding officer heard about it, he sent an order that we must stop. A little later we drifted back to our trenches, the fraternization ended. The game finished with a score of three goals to two in favour of 'Fritz' against 'Tommy'."
