In 1746 in West Africa, a child is playing on the banks of a stream. He's trying to catch a moorhen. It sounds picturesque, but within seconds this little boy will be abducted. He will be shipped across the globe to North Wales. This is the story of John Ystumllyn.

He is taken far from his home, far from everything and everyone he knows. Eventually, he arrives in Ynyscynhaiarn, Gwynedd to work for the Wynne family. We don't know what name his parents had given him, but the Wynnes named him 'John Ystumllyn' after their estate.

If you've been watching #AHouseThroughTime you'll have seen the story of Thomas, a black boy who was a 'servant' of a family in Bristol until he ran away in 1759. Boys like Thomas often appeared in portraits and still-life paintings in this period.

Over time, Margaret Gruffydd, the maid who brought him his bread, cheese and ale every day, fell in love with him, and married in 1768. The Wynne family gave them a cottage with a field in recognition of John's service. John and Margaret had seven children...

... And thus, John's African heritage was woven into the rich tapestry of Welsh ancestry and culture. John Ystumllyn was buried with dignity in the churchyard in Ynyscynhaiarn.
