Twitter Thread by POLITICO

POLITICO
@politico

The White House will be won or lost in these eight battleground states – and Biden is leading in all but one https://t.co/rtXPTpdbnr

In Arizona, Trump's handling of the pandemic is proving costly, leaving him struggling to match his 2016 performance among those over the age of 65 https://t.co/TTHvr8Sclg

Republicans typically hold a slight edge in absentee ballot returns in Florida elections. But this year, for the first time ever at this stage of a general election, Democrats here are outvoting Republicans — and by a huge margin https://t.co/BCsVccVn1Y

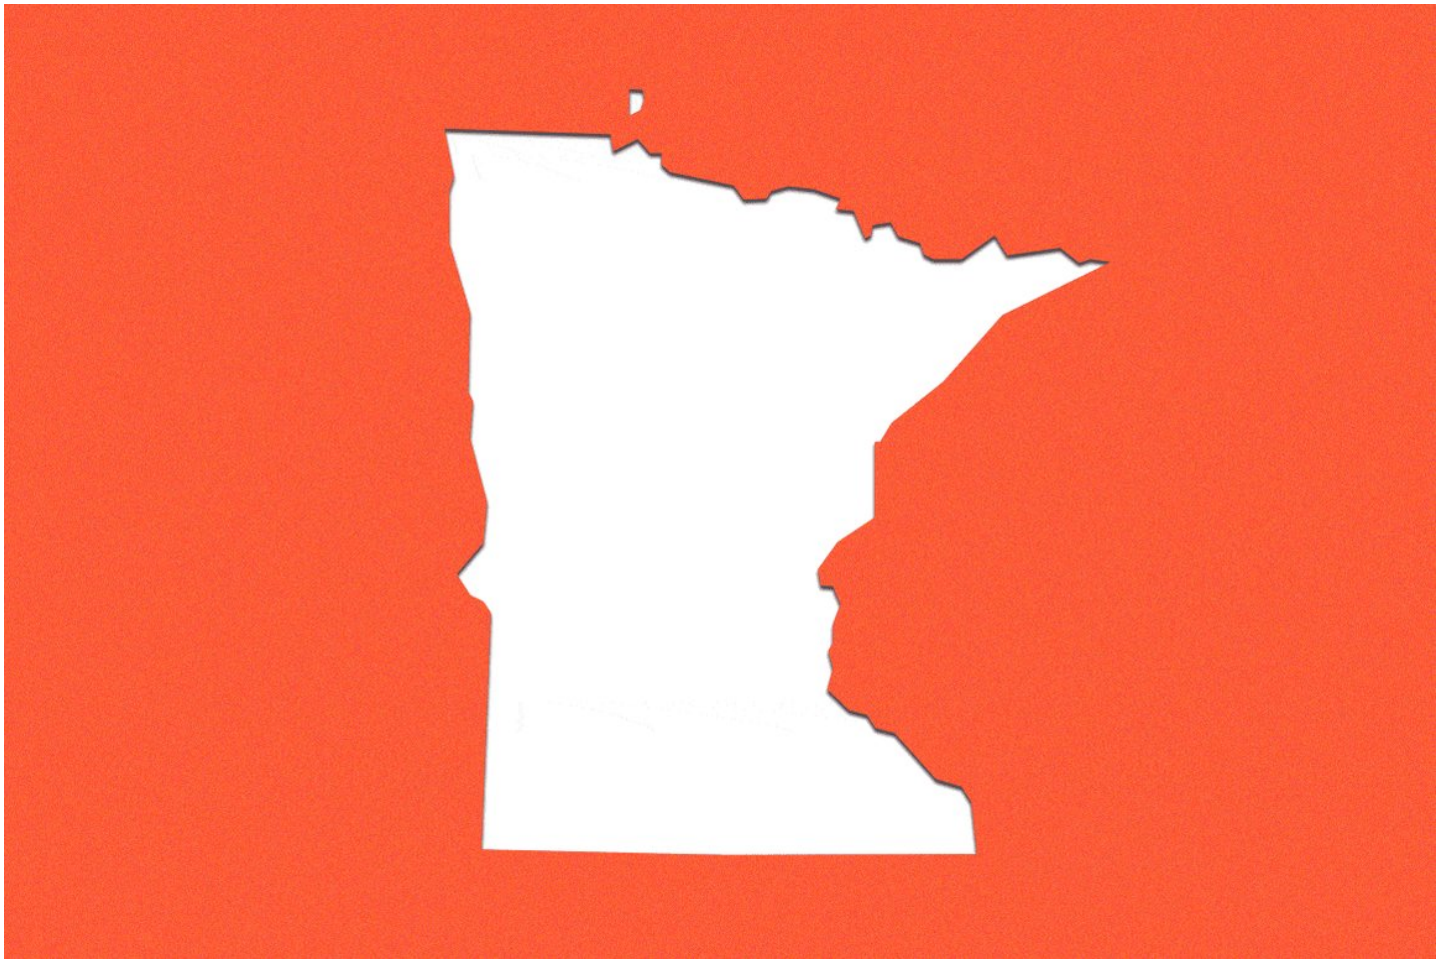

Most of the attention in Georgia this year is directed toward Atlanta’s populous suburbs, which have turned hard against Republicans in the Trump era, But the outcome might come down to a less scrutinized force in this state: white rural voters https://t.co/2W17tsDVyf

All three Rust Belt states that Trump improbably won in 2016 — Michigan, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin — are problematic for the president this year. But Michigan is where things look bleakest. https://t.co/aQo6KIQZVH

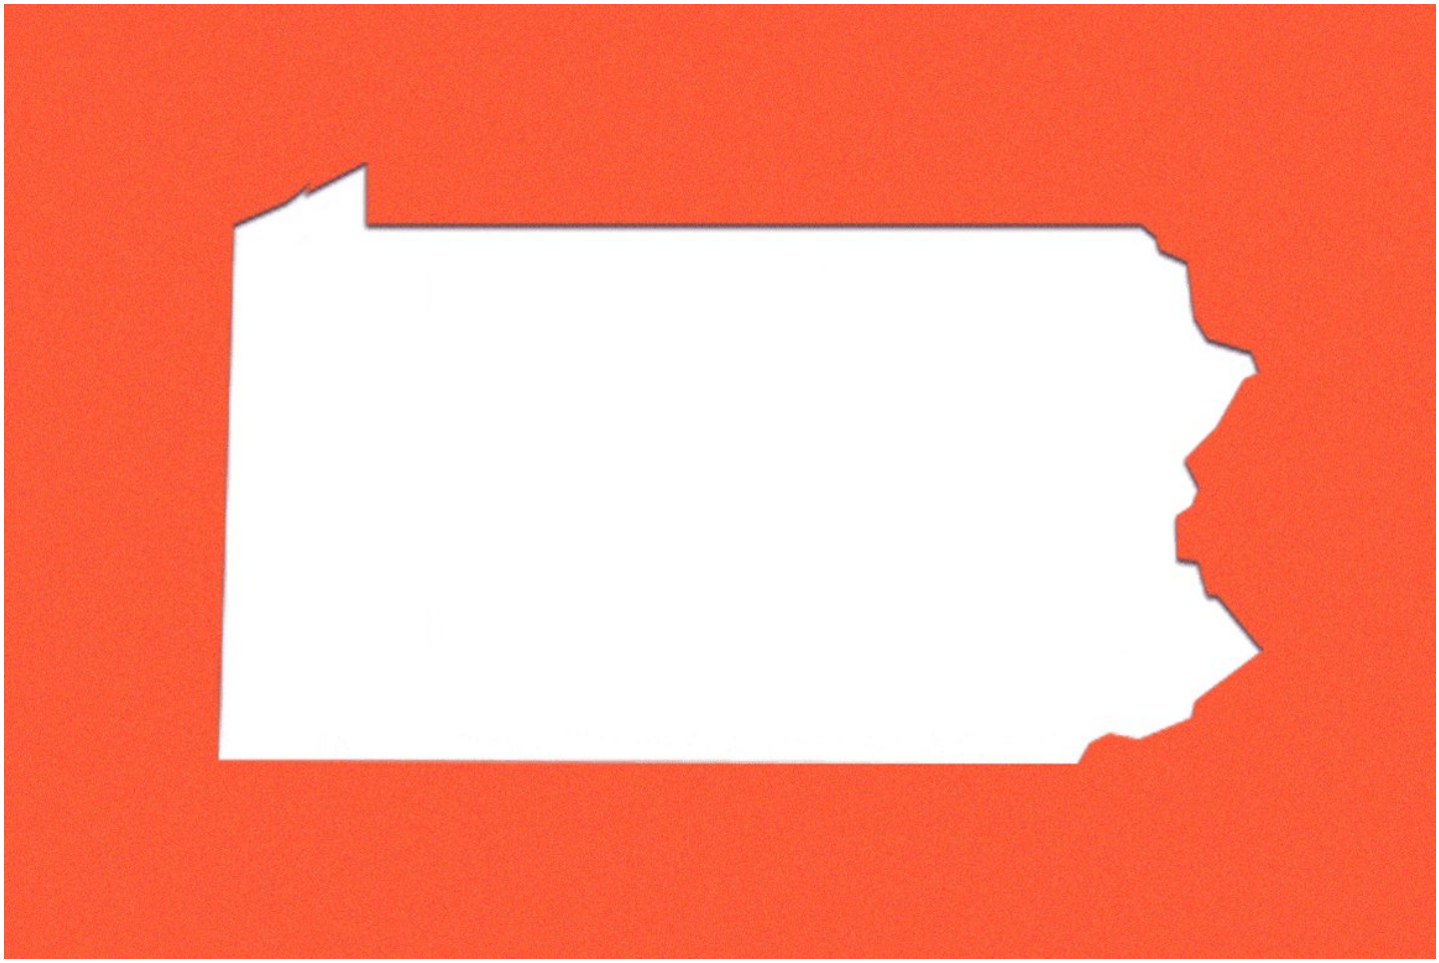

Donald Trump has fixated on Minnesota since his narrow loss to Hillary Clinton there four years ago. But he’s not running as well with white voters and independents as in 2016. And with less than a month until the election, his prospects are dimming. https://t.co/BSCxBllbF3

The two most populous counties in North Carolina are expected to play a decisive role in the presidential race, a closely contested Senate race and the governor’s contest https://t.co/z5gUho216T

For a few months this summer, things were moving in the right direction for Donald Trump in Pennsylvania. The president’s unsteady coronavirus leadership is a key reason for the decline. https://t.co/woFHw12ebL

A confluence of events over the past month — all seeming to favor Democrats — has shifted the dynamics in Wisconsin https://t.co/kzZheerc52

