

Twitter Thread by ■.■. ■■■■■■ #readoptimal

■.■. ■■■■■■ #readoptimal

@intelwire

I think this is debatable, and we won't know the answer for a while. There are two possible trajectories here. 1/x

Let's be clear: For the far-right groups that carried out Trump's insurrection, the siege of the Capitol was a huge success, a major propaganda coup. I talked to experts in right-wing extremism about what this event really meant to them. Alarming stuff: <https://t.co/EzjeGsTIZK>

— Greg Sargent (@ThePlumLineGS) January 8, 2021

Trajectory 1: The attack becomes a signal event like Ruby Ridge or Waco, and extremists use it as a rallying point going forward. They will certainly try to do this, but there are some key differences.

Primarily, the tepid federal response (which is bad on most levels) doesn't compare to those events, where LE screwed up and people died as an unambiguous result of questionable or straight bad LE action rather than the melee situation here.

Also those cases were the result of proactive federal enforcement, as opposed to a clearly defense posture here.

Trajectory 2 is backlash. There's some growing evidence for that in the snap polls from the last couple days. See:

<https://t.co/IOi6DCZ9CK>

<https://t.co/IOi6DCZ9CK>

This won't affect the diehards, but it might suggest the event won't bring a lot new blood into the movement.

Support for Trump supporters breaking into the US Capitol via new PBS/Marist poll:

All Americans:

8% support

88% oppose

Republicans:

18% support

80% oppose

Democrats:
3% support
96% oppose

— Ryan Struyk (@ryanstruyk) January 8, 2021

I suspect the backlash will grow if, as seems likely, more violence and/or intimidation occurs on Jan. 17 and Jan. 20.

It is possible, of course, that the trajectory will thread the needle between these poles, as the Unite the Right rally did. It didn't touch off a new golden age of extremism, but the pot has been simmering since then, with a longer-term effect.

And one point of value in these events, especially as the online crackdown grows, is that people meet and make connections IRL, some of which will be enduring connections.

On the other hand, a few people (and hopefully a lot by the end) are getting introduced to the idea of consequences for their actions, which may have a chilling effect.

Ultimately, none of this is likely to be clear until the Trump presidency is over, and maybe not then. But we've never had an extremist leader who was President (or ex-President) of the United States. And much will ride on what he does.

Ultimately, all bets are off until after the inauguration

Or more accurately, we can't assess the impact of this event until it's over, and it's not over yet.

Muting this thread because y'all can't stop feeding the trolls