Twitter Thread by [redacted]

[redacted]
@UnmodernM

Your 9 to 5 job can transform you into a man of value.

Stop working for the money. Work for authority.

This is a lesson from my dad.

A life hack.

Thread

You spend at least 40 hours a week at your work to make money.

Thats over 2000 hours a year. If you want these hours to mean more than just money, & help you develop your character, then your approach towards work must change.

Its an overlooked topic that industriousness has tremendous mental & psychological impact on men and their transformation of becoming high value.

Here's a step by step blueprint on letting your job mould your character.

If you want your job to infiltrate your personality and mould you into a man of value, you need authority.

So the first step is to assess the landscape of your job & whether you are able to attain this authoirty.

If you're in a work environment that makes you a supplicant to every person, quit your job.

I never recommend rash decisions, but working in a place where you are NOTHING but a subordinate, with ZERO opportunity to move up, is psychologically damaging to your manhood.

If you have no family responsibilities, quit your job & experience the necessary hardship of what it feels like to be jobless.

Look for a job that gives you room to escape subordination. Because then you can strive to attain authority.

Authority in your job is the secret.

Righteous authority that cannot be rebelled against, is the backbone of what makes us men.

Because when someone does what you tell them to do, you radiate every quality a man should possess; dominance, confidence, competence, respect, trust, fear, leadership.

There's 2 ways you can attain authority in a job that permits it:

1.Credentials - You have a licence that allows you to practice a specific job description no one else can.

2.Seeking responsibility in a valuable domain.

1 is easy, so I'll focus on 2.

To attain authority through responsibility, don't just blindly drown yourself in a barrel of favours by taking on every task in the workplace.

It's very easy to be seen as a slave, not knowing your own worth when you do more than you get paid.

You need to be strategic.

Look at your job description. Find out which domain makes the business the most amount of money.

Then seek responsibility around that domain. The aim is to become so competent & efficient in that specific domain, that the next best worker, simply suffers in comparison to you.

This will permit you to attain an authoritative position.

Because if you can extract the most amount of profit in the shortest possible timeframe, then you are holding a position of responsibility that's extremely valuable,

that which no one can perform better at than you.

So if its:

Serving customers- Find a way to make the most amount of sales while they admire you.

Ordering stock- Master efficiency ratios to optimise the inventory turnover.

Bartending- Learn a new drink a day while making the most amount of drinks in the shortest timeframe.

It DOESNT MATTER what the job is.

If there's room to improve, and you can leverage the improvement to cement a position of authority, then you've reached a stage where your job,

will mould your character to become a man of value.

You will BY DEFAULT, experience dominance in the workplace, which will inevitably extend itself in other areas of your life, when you begin to practice that same authority-attaining method.

You will gain confidence when you realise you outperform anyone in your line of work.

You will then be respected for your authority, and feared when things dont go your way. Why?

Because your way extracts the most amount of value in the shortest period of time. This cannot be argued against.

EVERY quality will be organically experienced & embodied.

Not to mention the attention of high value people you will draw.

You'll start popping up on the radar of ordinary customers that are actually high profile people (investors, executives, etc).

They will appreciate your work ethic.

You will be treated differently.

You will be known.

Word will get around. All it takes is one executive, one boss to recognise your efficiency, your perfection.

Then a greeting turns into a talk, which turns into a coffee, which turns into a connection.

Which can change your life.

DONT underestimate this.

Look at your 9 to 5 & let it psychologically transform you into a man you want to be.

If it cant, then quit.

Find a job where you can attain authority.

No course, no content, will EVER compare to occupying a position of authority 2000 hours a year while earning money for it.