A thread on $TSLA / $TSLAQ the stock in 2020:
Don’t retweet this, @gordonjohnson19 would not like the unit of #Gordon to trend. /2

/2 Some of you may ask: “What is a #Gordon?”
This used to be easy to answer. @gordonjohnson19 was famous for his bearish price target on $TSLA: $ 87. Prior to the 5/1 split. /3

/3 His price target (one #Gordon) translated into $17.40 post split. That price target was supposed to be the real value of the stock, those targets are usually for a twelve month timeframe: @Tesla the company ~ 1 #Gordon. /4

/4 One #Gordon wasn’t meant to tell us by how much the stock would rise every 10 days in 2020, but it ended up doing just that: $TSLA started the year at $86.05 or $430.25 pre split. It ended the year at $705.67, hence went up $619.62 ($3,098.10) or 35.6 #Gordon. /5

/5 So on average $TSLA added almost 1 #Gordon every 10 days. That’s despite falling to it’s annual relativ low on March 20th. /6

/6 At some time, @gordonjohnson19 must have gotten sick with people writing: “up two #Gordon for the day”. Instead of admitting defeat, he sneakily altered the value of his currency. A #newGordon replaced the trusted #Gordon, now valued at $40. /7

/7 He waited until October with this move. And still,.$TSLA the stock rose by ~ 6.4 #newGordon (~ 14.8 #Gordon) since that day. So: Please don’t make @gordonjohnson19 look like a fool at the turn of the year by retweeting this! /8

/8 And please don’t be like him: Whatever the real value of @Tesla the company, it’s more than a #Gordon or a #newGordon. Happy new year to all of $TSLA / $TSLAQ!
